Beyond Gender-Based Violence: Justice, Vision, and Accountability at the Intersection

JULY 29 through AUGUST 1, 2018
from Sunday 4:30 to Wednesday noon

Thanks to the work of Tarana Burke and other effective organizers of the “MeToo” era, sexual harassment and assault are being taken seriously in mass consciousness and popular culture, and several powerful men are being held accountable for their actions.

Building on this work, Pendle Hill is hosting a program that grapples with the roots of gender-based violence and paves a path toward a world where women, men, and people of all gender identities can thrive together.

We will hold a brave space for people of all genders to come together and vision a world where all can thrive and be free from interpersonal and societal violence locally and globally.

Participants will:

- Explore the context of gender-based discrimination and violence;
- Gain skills for recognizing and confronting the roots of gender-based violence within other systems of oppression;
- Connect with each other and be able to create more liberatory relationships;
- Identify their stake in creating a world without gender-based oppression
- Gain skills for empowerment, healing, and intersectional work toward overcoming interpersonal and systemic violence.
