

What does justice look like?

Moving towards a just peace in Palestine and Israel

70 years of Quaker engagement in Palestine

DECEMBER 14—16, 2018

Join the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC), the Quaker Palestine Israel Network (QPIN), and Pendle Hill for a weekend of exploring what it will take to realize a just and lasting peace in Palestine and Israel. AFSC and Quakers have been engaging in Palestine for over a century and working for peace with justice since 1948. After decades without change, we want to open up a conversation about what is needed for a just future.

It has been 70 years since the 1948 war, when over 750,000 Palestinians were forcibly displaced and the State of Israel was born. It has been over 50 years since Israel occupied the West Bank and Gaza, gaining control of all of historic Palestine. It has been 25 years since Yasser Arafat and Yitzhak Rabin shook hands on the White House lawn at the start of the Oslo Peace Process.

But 25 years after the start of what was intended to be a five-year peace process, we must start questioning that framework. Why hasn't peace yet been achieved? What paradigm shifts are needed to bring change? What are the historic injustices that need to be righted, and what might it look like to address these issues in the present? What actions can people outside of the conflict take to promote change?

Join us for an interactive weekend of panels and workshops to:

- Learn about what is needed to support change in Israel and Palestine;
- Gain skills for taking action and building intersectional work towards change
- Connect with other people interested in building towards a different future and taking action;
- Give and receive support as you continue to work towards change after the conference.
